TAKE THE BAIT!!

Harry Brock smiled at the image in the mirror and of course the image smiled right back at him. Carefully he adjusted his blue tie. Then he brushed a speck of dust from the lapel of his black serge suit. And finally he ran his hand over his dark hair. In every way, Harry Brock was satisfied with himself, especially with the crime he was contemplating. A voice belonging to his partner, Robert Lowery, called his attention to a very obvious fact.

"If you keep on admiring yourself all day long in that blasted mirror, you'll never sell our sucker your bill of goods. You have half an hour to get over to the bank, so I suggest you be there on time. It will make a good impression."

Harry Brock walked into the living room of their three-room suite at the Creston Arms. Half slumped in a massive easy chair, the junior half of the partnership made some more pertinent remarks.

"Now remember, Harry, don't overplay your part. The Honorable John Butterfield is no fool. I've done a lot of checking on him. He didn't become owner of that bank and the town's leading citizen on his good looks, 'cause he hasn't any. He has a face that only a mother could love. he might call the police or the Feds. Just keep your wits about you and your eyes open."

The senior half of the partnership walked over to the door and placed his hand on the knob. He had a few parting words to get out of his system before he went on the task of hooking his prospective victim.

"When I play on human nature, I'm bound to win. People are greedy to make money, especially easy money when there isn't a risk to be taken. A banker wants to make money, and Honorable John Butterfield is a banker. Bet you two to one I hook him for at least twenty grand."

The receptionist at the Third National Bank was all smiles. "Mr. Brock," she said in a sweet tone of voice acquired at Mrs. Tilton's Business School, "Mr. Butterfield is waiting for you in his private office. Walk straight ahead and turn to the right. First door you see."

Harry Brock found it hard to repress a smile that wanted to play on his lips. Why shouldn't Butterfield be waiting for him? Why not, when he had been told that an important business man wanted to see him about a money investment? He came up face to face with a large glass door on which golden letters informed everyone: "Mr. John Butterfield, President." As a mere formality he knocked once and a deep guttural voice inside answered, "Come right in."

John Butterfield was a small man, about five feet six. He wore a closely-trimmed gray-black beard. Most of his hair had long since departed. There was a small but noticeable hook in his nose and he wore very thick lenses. He arose and extended his right hand. "Mr. Brock, I presume?" "Correct, Mr. Butterfield," was the reply. "I know you are a very business-like man and hate to waste time, so I will come right to the point." And finishing these words, he took from his inner coat pocket, a wallet. From the wallet he carefully extracted twenty bills and placed them upon the banker's desk. Each was a five dollar bill and a Silver Certificate, and they were all perfectly new. "Is there anything the matter with these bills?" asked Harry Brock. Mr. Butterfield picked one up and looked at it. Then he opened a side drawer in his desk and took out a small magnifying glass. He examined each bill minutely. Finally he opened a larger center drawer and from it took several sheets with serial numbers on them.

"These bills are neither counterfeit nor are they stolen money," was his final observation. "Just what is your purpose in showing me these bills?"

The answer was something like a thunderbolt from heaven. "I will sell you the entire lot, worth one hundred dollars for sixty dollars. Want to buy them?"

"Just what is your game?" demanded the banker in no uncertain tone of voice. "Is there any reason why I shouldn't call the police? Either you are a crank with lots of money to give away or you have some kind of fraud in mind."

CRIME AND JUSTICE

There wasn't the slightest change of facial expression on Harry Brock's face. He had expected just such a reaction—at first. "If you call the police," he pointed out, "you can't make any charges against me. In fact, I can sue you for false arrest. If you don't want to buy this bargain, just say so. I have other business to take care of this afternoon."

The banker at once became very apologetic. "Don't misunderstand me. It's just that I never in my entire experience as a banker have had such a business proposition put to me. Needless to say I want to make money and it must be in a legitimate way. I'll buy those bills. And if I want more, where can I reach you?"

"At the Creston Arms. And I will only be there for the balance of the week. Have to leave for the West Coast. If you want to buy $1,000 more of these bills, call me. If I'm out, leave a message: 'Deal is satisfactory.'"

Back in his suite, Harry Brock was all smiles. "You should see the way our fish took the bait," he explained to his junior partner. "Bet we get a call tomorrow for more of the green-goods. I can always spot the type. We're going to trim him and for plenty."

The next day the two partners took in the sights of the town and visited several of the leading taverns, sampling the beverages in no small quantities. When they reached the hotel, the telephone operator informed them of a message from Mr. Butterfield: "Deal is satisfactory. Come at nine to bank."

The next morning Robert Lowery was in high spirits as he stuffed brand new five dollar silver certificates into a brief case. "I guess you sized up this O.K.," he admitted. "The real test will come after he buys these bills. Will he fall for the machine?"

For the last question the senior partner had the ready answer. "They all do. Stop worrying and give me the once over. Do I look like the successful business man?" The junior partner shook his head in the affirmative. "Do we go to Florida or will it be Southern France? Get this dough, then we'll decide."

The receptionist gave Harry Brock her best smile. "Mr. Butterfield is expecting you. You know how to get to his office." With head high in the air, he walked into the private office of the banker, this time without knocking.

"Have a seat," welcomed the banker. "Hope you brought the money with you." In reply, Harry Brock opened his brief case and took out the money. He spread the bills on the desk and the banker examined them all very carefully. Then he opened a drawer and took out a bundle of bills. "There's your six hundred dollars," he said. "You don't know how grateful I am for this chance to make money. My daughter gets married next month. I want to buy her a $10,000 house as a wedding present."

The last statement did it. The time was ripe to hook the fish for everything he had. "I must leave town day after tomorrow. If you want $80,000 of these bills, come to my suite with $20,000 in small bills and we'll do business."

"I will be there tomorrow at about ten in the morning," replied the banker. "And you don't know how appreciative I am of this opportunity you have presented me with to make the extra money I need." It took a lot of will power on the part of Harry Brock to restrain from laughing. But with $20,000 before his eyes as future reward, he managed to control himself.

The next morning Mr. Butterfield appeared on time. "Have you got the money with you?" demanded Harry Brock. In reply, the banker opened a large package and took out twenty one thousand dollar bills. "Sorry I couldn't get small bills," he apologized. "Guess these will do."

Harry Brock pointed to a large package on the table as he took the bills. "There they are and you can count them for . . ." He never finished the statement. The phone in the next room rang and Robert Lowery appeared. "Phone for you, Mr. Brock," he announced.

The senior partner stepped into the next room and then shut the door. "Let's beat it now," he suggested. The two opened the door and found themselves facing a revolver. A powerful voice ordered, "Inside boys, while we put the cuffs on you."

At the Federal Building, Harry Brock pleaded, "Have a heart and tell me what went wrong. How did you fellows get wise to me?"

Special Agent John Simmonds was obliging. "You fellows always imagine everyone is greedy and crooked. Mr. Butterfield is an honest citizen. He notified us at once. We wired his office the second time you were there. We wired your suite while you were out. And he has a message for you. There's about $10,000 in rewards for your capture and he gets it all. He says, thanks to you fellows, he can give his daughter that new house."

While there is something new under the sun almost every day, Beauticians, Expert Hairdressers and Dermatologists are all familiar with the use of LANOLIN. In recent years, it has been believed that CHOLESTEROL is the active ingredient of LANOLIN. CHOLESTEROL is an ingredient found in all vegetables, in all animals, and in our own bodies. It is now possible for chemists to produce a synthetic CHOLESTEROL, which makes it possible to use CHOLESTEROL in this Special Hair and Scalp System. Your hair grows from the follicles located in the tissues of your scalp. The condition of your hair depends upon the normal health of your scalp. The LANOLIN Cream Shampoo which you receive with this treatment is to be used as a Shampoo to cleanse the hair and scalp of dust, dried perspiration, grime, etc.

CRIME TRACKS

How criminals are trapped

It is possible to determine the weight and type of car that made certain tracks by comparing them with the tracks of other cars

A better definition of car tracks can be seen under a magnifying glass, by the use of an oblique light.

If it is necessary to preserve the characteristics of a tire track, a plaster cast may be made of it.

Casts may also be made from foot-prints in mud. Also, it is possible to learn the weight of the man making the prints by comparing them with prints made by different sized men.

Sometimes a car can be identified by an injury to surface of the tire tread.

The direction a car has been travelling may sometimes be determined by the shapes of the oil drippings.

The designs of standard tire treads have been classified and numbered so that the treads of any make of tire can be quickly identified.
